

Where Are They Now?

From Access to Philosophy to BA at Heythrop

DIKE OKOH

In September 2004, I started the Access to philosophy course at the Mary Ward Centre. The College's warm and friendly atmosphere together with its tradition of teaching excellence gave me confidence and made me relish the opportunity to develop further the ability to tackle philosophical questions, analyse concepts and generally dissect arguments at undergraduate level.

After I completed the course, I received my London Open College Network Access certificate.

In 2005/2006 I went on to study advanced European philosophy (also) at the Mary Ward centre. I continued my work as a musician, primarily recording and working on compositions for myself and other artists as well as exploring independent fiction writing on philosophical ideas relating to what I had studied in the context of both courses. I am currently in my first year at Heythrop College, University of London; doing a BA philosophy degree.
